

YOUR SIMPLE WEEKLY PLANNER

A five-minute template for laying out your training week before it starts.

Most missed workouts aren't decided in the moment, they're decided days earlier, by never actually being scheduled in the first place. A plan that only exists as a vague intention ("I'll train more this week") is easy to skip. A plan written down, with a day and a session attached to it, is a lot harder to talk yourself out of. This planner takes five minutes to fill out and gives your week an actual shape.

How to Use It

- Do this at the same time every week, Sunday evening or Monday morning both work well, pick one and keep it consistent.
- For each day, write down one of three things: a specific session ("Push day" or "30-min walk"), Rest, or Flex (a placeholder you'll decide the morning of, based on how the week is going).
- Note your one non-negotiable day, the single session in the week you will not move or skip no matter what. Everything else can flex around it.
- Add one line at the bottom for the week's focus, one sentence, not a paragraph, something like "Get all three lifting days in" or "Hit 8,000 steps daily."

- This week's one focus: _____

Why This Small a Tool Actually Works

The value here isn't complexity, it's the act of deciding in advance. A written plan moves the decision-making out of the moment you're most likely to skip (tired, busy, unmotivated) and into a calmer five minutes at the start of the week. Print it, keep it on your phone, stick it on the fridge, wherever you'll actually see it. The format matters less than the habit of filling it out every single week.
